HONORING VETERANS

After eight years in the Marines and three tours in the Middle East, the invisible wounds of combat didn't hit me until later... after marriage and having kids. Even with achievements and celebrations, I noticed the weight of my experiences catching up with me.

Over time, experiencing PTS, survivor's guilt, and the loss of friends to suicide led to coping mechanisms I knew were unhealthy. Home Base helped me recognize "it's ok to not be ok" and the importance of asking for help. Through therapy and prolonged exposure, I learned to tell my story, face my trauma, and rebuild my life. Now, I've been given a new duty in purpose: to continue serving, to be open about my struggles, and to help fellow veterans get the care they need when they need it.

Transitioning back to civilian life was not without its challenges. The Warrior Foundation Freedom Station provided me with a community, resources, and stability at a time when I needed it most. They offered housing, structure, and access to a network of veterans who understood the unique struggles of coming home from combat. This environment gave me the space to recover, rebuild, and focus on setting goals for my future.

Beyond just support services, Freedom Station gave me purpose. It reintroduced me to the value of teamwork and accountability outside of the military, while helping me develop the skills and confidence needed to thrive personally and professionally. Through their programs, I was able to strengthen my foundation, regain direction, and ultimately build a successful path forward in my civilian career.

When my doctor first recommended Home Base's Intensive Clinical Program (ICP), I wasn't sure what to expect. It's a two-week outpatient program with up to two years of follow-on care. After some convincing, I went—and I'm glad I did. I was placed in a Special Operations Forces group with Green Berets, Navy SEALs, Navy EOD, and Air Force Special Operators. Home Base matches people with similar experiences. It's powerful to connect with people who "get it."

The days were packed—individual and group therapy, yoga, art therapy, active recovery training, stress management, even cooking classes. While I was in session, my wife participated in a parallel program for families, learning how to support her own health and resilience. When we returned home, the care program continued with local counselors in Pensacola. Overall, this was one of the most complete, personal, and impactful experiences I've ever had.

Coming home from combat wasn't easy. I felt lost, angry, and alone.

The war was over, but the battle inside me wasn't. Then I found the Wounded Warrior Project and Home Base. They gave me a safe place to face my pain and was surrounded by people who truly understood. Through counseling and community, I learned I'm not broken. I'm rebuilding. These programs gave me strength, hope, and purpose. They even helped me save my marriage and reconnect with my family.

Today, I'm not just surviving, I'm living. And thanks to these organizations, I know we are not alone, we are not broken, we are rebuilding together.
